Pursuing a degree in Community-Based Family and Consumer Sciences Education prepares students for outreach and education in nonformal settings and community engagement. Students develop a diverse background in FCS content areas. The curriculum includes courses in all the FCS areas: financial literacy, human relationships, child development, apparel and textile construction, interior design, nutrition and foods and leadership. Additional courses in nonformal education include: nonformal teaching methods, volunteer programs, community programming and evaluation, and youth development. Students will also gain knowledge about communication, analytical reasoning, critical thinking, effective writing and teamwork. Students complete two internships in a community-based emphasis starting their junior year with an FCS-based business, public or private agency, commodity organization, nonprofit organization or Extension office. Students may take some additional courses to obtain a related minor.
